III. Paragraph Writing: The Eyes Are Not Here

Question 1:

Give examples showing how the narrator tried to appear normal-sighted during his encounter with the girl.

Answer:

- He initiates a conversation with the girl to engage her.
- He mentions that he "heard" her rather than saw her, keeping his blindness hidden.
- He describes Mussoorie in October as if he can visualize it.
- He sits facing the window, pretending to observe the view, and makes a casual remark about the trees.

- He comments vaguely on her face, saying it's "interesting."

Paragraph:

To initiate the conversation and prevent her from noticing his blindness, he described the scenery based on his memories. When he asked her a question about the view, she suggested he look out the window himself. To continue his pretense, he commented that she had an "interesting face," concealing the fact that he had no idea how she actually looked.

Question 2:

Everyone thinks they can outwit others, but sometimes they themselves are outwitted. Explain this with reference to the story.

Answer:

- The narrator enjoys playing a game of deception with strangers, concealing his blindness.
- He assumes everyone he meets is sighted and does not mention his own blindness.
- Focused on maintaining his act, he overlooks details about what the other person might reveal.

Paragraph:

After overhearing the girl's conversation with her parents, the narrator didn't catch anything unusual that would hint at her having a disability. He assumed she was sighted, unknowingly deceiving himself. It appears he also misled the girl, as she didn't realize that her fellow traveller was blind either.

Question 3:

The story concludes with the new fellow traveler informing the narrator that the girl was completely blind. How do you think the narrator would feel upon learning this truth?

Answer:

- The narrator is still absorbed in thoughts about the girl who just left.
- As the new traveller enters the compartment, he prepares to play his favourite game again.
- The traveller's unexpected comment about the girl being blind would likely shock and embarrass him.

Paragraph:

This twist offers both readers and the narrator a powerful lesson about how initial assumptions shape our perception (or misperception) of others and the world around us.

The Eyes Are Not Here Summary

"The Eyes Are Not Here" is an engaging and thought-provoking story by Ruskin Bond. The narrator, blind and able to distinguish only between light and darkness, is travelling on a train. Although he hasn't been blind from birth, he now plays a regular game of pretending to see, hoping others won't realize his blindness. When a girl enters the compartment, he listens to her voice and the sound of her slippers, pretending he is normal-sighted as he begins a conversation with her.

He opens by asking where she is headed, and the girl, surprised to realize she isn't alone, replies that she will be getting off at Saharanpur, where her aunt will meet her. They continue a light conversation, exchanging remarks about Mussoorie in October and the scenery outside. The narrator compliments her by saying she has an interesting face, and she responds that he is quite gallant.

Soon, her station arrives, and she begins to leave. The narrator feels regretful as he wishes to know more about her, even wondering about her hairstyle, but she bids him goodbye and exits. As she leaves, there is a bit of confusion at the doorway, and another man enters the compartment. Noticing the narrator's serious expression, the man apologizes for not being as attractive as the girl who just left. The narrator seizes this chance and asks if the man noticed whether the girl had long or short hair. The man replies that he hadn't noticed her hairstyle—but that she was, in fact, blind.

The narrator is left in stunned silence, as he had not realized the girl's blindness. Throughout their conversation, she had replied thoughtfully and cleverly, giving the impression of being fully sighted. Just as the narrator had hidden his blindness from her, she too had hidden hers from him. This unexpected twist leaves both the narrator and the reader with a sense of irony and amazement, adding depth to the story and making it a truly memorable tale.
